History

The Model 94 was designed by John Browning, one of the most prolific firearms designers of all time. Browning had previously designed the Winchester Model 1886, a lever-action rifle that was chambered for high-powered cartridges. The Model 1886 was a success, but it was too powerful for many hunters. Browning therefore designed the Model 94 as a lighter, more compact, and more versatile rifle that could be chambered for a variety of cartridges, including the .30-30 Winchester, which became one of the most popular hunting cartridges in the world.

The Model 94 was an immediate success. It was lighter and more compact than the Model 1886, and it was chambered for a variety of cartridges that made it suitable for hunting a wide range of game. The Model 94 was also very well made, with a reputation for reliability and accuracy.

The Model 94 was used extensively by hunters throughout the early 20th century. It was also used by law enforcement officers and military personnel. The Model 94 was particularly popular with the United States Cavalry, which used it as a standard issue rifle from 1899 to 1911.

The Model 94 continued to be produced after World War I, and it remained a popular choice for hunters and law enforcement officers. In 1964, the Model 94 was redesigned with a new stock and forearm. This new model, known as the Model 9422, was chambered for the .22 Long Rifle cartridge. The Model 9422 was also a success, and it remains a popular choice for small game hunting and target shooting.

The Model 94 is still in production today, and it is one of the most popular lever-action rifles on the market. It is a versatile rifle that is suitable for hunting a wide range of game, and it is also a popular choice for law enforcement officers and military personnel.
